THE TICHBORNE DINNER.

Curious Custom of the South of England That Had a Very Pretty Origin,

The pilgrim along the pathway of curious customs, the searcher after singular observances, finds many things to interest him. Some are great na-tional festivals with odd rites injected into their ceremonies, others are bizarre municipa, affairs, others have lived their life in the past and exist but as a memory to-day, others are vijlage or parish customs scarce known beyond the borders of the brief district of their observance, but none have a prettier legend for their origin and a more rational celebration in the present day than the annual charity offering and charity dinner held at Tichborne, Hampshire, England, on St. Cronan's day, January 26, says the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. Many years ago, at a time not particularly set forth in the legend, the story runs, there lived in the manor house of Tichborne the rough, bear-like and uncharitable Sir Roger Tichborne. He was fond of riotous living, card playing, hunting and rough sports, but had not the saving grace possessed by so many of his kind-occasional gleams of kindness, charity and large-heartedness. Mean, crafty, cunning and brutal, he took particular delight in inflicting misery upon the poor and those over whom he exercised authority, and he was heartily hated throughout the length and breadth of Hampshire. His wife, the Lady Ma-bella, was his opposite in every respect. Dr. G. F. Sprague spent Fourth of which would otherwise appear attractive gentle in disposition, her charitable An occasional dose of which she took the keenest delight was of the village church on St. Cronan's day. During the closing years of her life, however, she lost her estates, her private fortune was awept away, and her acts of charity were thus brought to an untimely end. She begged her husband for the means to at least continue her St. Cronan day charity, but he only mocked her tears and prayers. rare compassion, however, Sir Roger At last he told her that he would give her for the purpose just so much land as she could compass in a walk while a knot of wood was burning

The Lady Mabella was so il! she could scarce stand on her feet, and Sir Roger must have chuckled when he named the grapes, no sale for wine, or grapes any more and more drunkeness exists than ever before, blind tigers are everywhere; the people don't want it, but it was fastened on them they thinking it would be a good thing; now the ring holds it. Should we have a dispensary in Florida the small grape grower will lose all sale of grapes and those making wine will lose much in the way of buildings, machinery and wine on hand. The dispensary advocates don't even give a wine maker a chance to get great reverence to all visitors at Tich-borne. Fearing that the agreement might later be violated Lady Mabella laid a curse on the family just before she expired that if such a thing should fare of Putnam county had better go ever come to pass the manorial home to the polls on the lith with a mind made up to vote against the dispensary. Think well of this and act in the family name become extinct. But ment. The proceeds from the crops raised on the 23 acres were donated to the parish, and the distribution of the bread purchased with it made every St. Cronan's day. In the year 1796 the custom was so much abused that the Tiehborne of the day decided to discontinue it. When he married his children were all daughters, and the name three inches.
